To keep you all in the loop on this: Adam Goldman of the Washington Post has a story he is working on that CIA working with GIJoe creator Don Levine developed toys for distribution to children in Afghanistan. Levine's family has apparently given Goldman some information. Levine passed away in May 2014. The most inflammatory part of the story is that Levine developed and made 1000 UBL dolls that had paint on the eyes that would rub off and create a "devil-eye" effect.

We spoke to the reporter today to follow up. He said the following:

- He has seen a picture of the action figures of the devil-eyed UBL dolls
- He has proof of some kind that 1000 or so of the action figures were made by the company in China
- He knows that the relationship between CIA and Don Levine was beyond the dolls – to include backpacks, bicycle pumps and some girls toys
- The relationship goes back to 2005 – that we wanted to leverage his contacts in China
- The material was shipped through Karachi to Afghanistan
- He didn’t mention D/NCS in this call, although he made a reference to him in the initial inquiry.
From: (b)(3)
Sent: Monday, June 16, 2014 11:01 AM
To: (b)(3)
Cc: (b)(3)
Subject: RE: FLASH FYSA: Possible Future Washington Post Article regarding CIA Covert Influence Operations

FYL, from the reporter:

The Post will be publishing fotos of the final prototype. I also have pictures of an earlier prototype. The figures were shipped in 2006 aboard YM Energy from Yantain to Karachi.

http://www.fleetmon.com/en/vessels/Ym_Energy_7825
From: Ronald O. Boyce (b)(3)
Sent: Thursday, June 12, 2014 6:07 PM
To: John O. Brennan; Avril Haines; Meroe S. Park (b)(3)

Subject: (b)(3)

Classification: SECRET//NOFORN

(U//FOUO) Greg Miller (Washington Post) heard that ISIL is flush with hundreds of millions in cash after overrunning several banks in Mosul.

(U//FOUO) Siobhan Gorman (Wall Street Journal) asked about the outlook in Iraq and whether ISIL would hold the territory it’s taken.

(U//FOUO) Eric Schmitt (NYT) – keying off a report by the WSJ – asked if Iran was deploying IRGC (Quds Force) fighters to Iraq in order to help the Maliki Government counter the ISIL offensive.

(U//FOUO) Nancy Youssef (McClatchy News) asked to what extent non-ISIL Sunni fighters are supporting ISIL in its military offensive.

(U//FOUO) Aram Roston (Buzzfeed), who said he was not writing for this evening, asked if the CIA was caught off guard by recent events in Iraq, specifically the ISIL offensive in Mosul.

(S//NF) Adam Goldman (Washington Post) is writing story for publication next week in which he will allege CIA worked with a US toy manufacturer to produce some 1000 UBL/Devil dolls that were shipped from China to Karachi in 2006. Goldman said he understands the dolls contained a dissolvable material which, upon handling, turned the UBL doll into a demon-like figure.
Bob Windrem (NBC) is doing a piece examining the state of play on the abduction of the school girls in Nigeria. His piece will focus on Boko Haram as one of the most violent groups in the Jihadi universe.

A Pakistani news outlet and NBC asked for our comment on recent reports of US drone strikes in Pakistan.
(U/FOUO) Several news outlets (CNN, Times of London, Daily Mail) inquired about the Washington Post story that broke today alleging that CIA worked in the mid-2000s to create a bin Laden action figure doll that transformed into a "devil doll" as part of an influence campaign. OPA provided the same on the record statement that it had provided to the Post: “The action figure idea was proposed and rejected by CIA before it got past the prototype stage. To our knowledge, there were only three individual action figures ever created and these were merely to show what a final product might look like. After being presented with these examples, the CIA declined to pursue this idea and did not produce or distribute any of these action figures. Furthermore, CIA has no knowledge of these action figures being produced or distributed by others.

(U/FOUO) Ian Shapira (Washington Post) wrote us to say he was intrigued by the feature story on our website that details the Agency's historical use of pneumatic tubes to transfer information. He is interested in interviewing any of the 11 individuals mentioned anonymously in the story who are still alive.
CBS This Morning contacted OPA about potentially doing a feature story on how the CIA has embraced social media as a communications tool. The reporter noted that she was impressed by the Agency's use of these platforms compared to how other federal agencies use such accounts. (b)(3)

Dean Boyd
Director, CIA Office of Public Affairs

(b)(3)

Classification: UNCLASSIFIED//FOUO
To: b

Subject: [A1N] FW: WP: CIA hatched plan to make demon toy to counter bin Laden influence

Classification: UNCLASSIFIED

CLASSIFICATION: UNCLASSIFIED

Folks:

FYI:

Here's our statement on the UBL devil doll issue in WP story

- "The action figure idea was proposed and rejected by CIA before it got past the prototype stage. To our knowledge, there were only three individual action figures ever created and these were merely to show what a final product might look like. After being presented with these examples, the CIA declined to pursue this idea and did not produce or distribute any of these action figures. Furthermore, CIA has no knowledge of these action figures being produced or distributed by others."

CIA hatched plan to make demon toy to counter bin Laden influence
Washington Post // ADAM GOLDMAN

Approved for Release: 2019/03/27 C06223512
For more than a decade, the CIA has deployed drones, satellites, spies, informants and tracking devices to thwart al-Qaeda in Pakistan.

The spy agency also considered a plan to wage war with toys.

Beginning in about 2005, the CIA began secretly developing a custom-made Osama bin Laden action figure, according to people familiar with the project. The faces of the figures were painted with a heat-dissolving material, designed to peel off and reveal a red-faced bin Laden who looked like a demon, with piercing green eyes and black facial markings.

The goal of the short-lived project was simple: spook children and their parents, causing them to turn away from the actual bin Laden.

The code-name for the bin Laden figures was "Devil Eyes," and to create them the CIA turned to one of the best minds in the toy business, said those familiar with the project, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to discuss the project publicly.

The toymaker was Donald Levine, the former Hasbro executive who was instrumental in the creation of the wildly popular G.I. Joe toys that generated more than $5 billion in sales after hitting the shelves in 1964.

The CIA's interest in Levine was two-fold: He had an eye for toys and a vast network of contacts in China, where the bin Laden action figures were ultimately manufactured. Levine had done business there for nearly 60 years and had the means to have the action figures discreetly developed and manufactured.

Levine died in May at 86 after a lengthy battle with cancer. In response to questions about his work on the bin Laden toys, his family said in a statement: "Don Levine was a dedicated Patriot, and proud Korean War veteran. When called on, he was honored to assist our country."

There's a dispute over how many of the figurines, if any, were ultimately delivered. A person with direct knowledge of the project in China said hundreds of the toys — one of which was seen by The Washington Post — were made as part of a preproduction run and sent on a freighter to the Pakistani city of Karachi in 2006.

The CIA, while not disputing that it had commissioned the bin Laden figures, said the project was discontinued shortly after the prototypes were developed.

"To our knowledge, there were only three individual action figures ever created and these were merely to show what a final product might look like," said CIA spokesman Ryan Trapani. "After being presented with these examples, the CIA declined to pursue this idea and did not produce or distribute any of these action figures. Furthermore, CIA has no knowledge of these action figures being produced or distributed by others."

Regardless of how far the "Devil Eyes" project proceeded, it appears to have borne all the hallmarks of what are known as influence operations in intelligence parlance. As part of its covert action programs, the agency has for decades tried to win the hearts and minds of local populations or turn them against a particular ideology.

During the Cold War, for instance, the CIA secretly published both Western and Russian literature for distribution behind the Iron Curtain, created Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, subsidized intellectual magazines, underwrote concert tours and art exhibitions, and bankrolled academic seminars.

The agency also used young provocateurs to disrupt communist youth festivals and dropped propaganda leaflets from balloons.

All of it — from the high brow to the highjinks — was designed to either undermine the Soviet Union and its satellites or bolster support for the United States in key countries around the world.

Those efforts continued after the end of the Cold War. Prior to the U.S. invasion of Haiti in 1994, for instance, the CIA distributed soccer balls to demonstrate the generosity of the United States.
“It made them feel good about Americans,” a former CIA official said. “We were there trying to prepare the way for the military.”

Little is known about the kind of influence operations the CIA has run since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as part of the broader fight against al-Qaeda and Islamic extremism.

In Afghanistan, the CIA had locals broadcast propaganda from a forward operating base known as Camp Chapman in Khost province, the same base where seven CIA officers were later killed in a 2009 suicide bombing.

“Some of these have been considered successful and some have not been successful,” said Arturo Munoz, a former CIA officer who teaches a course at Georgetown University on covert action, who stressed that he was referring only to decades-old declassified operations.

The bin Laden venture began in 2005 as a plan to give its allies in the Afghanistan region material that could be handed out to children to build goodwill. The handouts included toys, school supplies such as pencils and notebooks for distribution.

“It appealed to [Levine] because it had nothing to do with actually hurting someone,” said a person familiar with his decision to get involved. “It was the softer side of the CIA.”

The agency approved the production of the gift items, which were put in backpacks for distribution, blue for boys and pink for girls.

CIA officials later approached Levine about the possibility of producing the bin Laden figures and having them sent to Pakistan or Afghanistan. Levine was initially ambivalent about the project but would later throw himself into the work, according to the people familiar with the project.

Levine developed prototypes before settling on a standard 12-inch figure with the unique facial features. Bin Laden’s head was superimposed on a figurine that was already in production in the Chinese city of Dongguan.

A Chinese artist took publicly available photographs of bin Laden and created an image that was strikingly close in appearance to the al-Qaeda leader. The final prototype was dressed in traditional garb and packaged in a cheap box covered with plastic and presented to the CIA for approval. Levine was said to have been pleased with the final bin Laden product.

Although the CIA said it decided not to move forward with the operation, at least one of the figures remains at the agency’s headquarters.